ABSTRACT

This study discusses the racism reflected in Morisseau's Pipeline. The discussion focuses on the types of racism and the cause and effect of racism. The analysis is based on theory of racism that includes types of racism i.e. interpersonal racism, institutional racism, structural racism, internalized racism ; how racism manifest in everyday life, causes of racism and effects of racism. This research is designed with qualitative research that applies sociological approach. The result of analysis shows that the four types of racism a found in the story. The interpersonal racism occurs in the form of discrimination and stereotypes. The institutional racism is evident in an unfair and unequal education system, where black students are often seen as less capable or problematic and placed in less supportive programs. The structural racism is reflected in unequal access, opportunities, and resources to education for black students. The internalized racism is evidence in the internal conflict and feelings of inferiority experienced by the characters due to the skin colour. In addition, the causes of racism include family instability, a harsh school environment, and external factors. Furthermore, the play highlights the negative impact of racism on everyday life through the characters' experiences and relationships in a predominantly black urban environment.
